Easter seder is more than a fancy meal. This is an opportunity to use all our senses to retell the story of the Exodus from Egypt, one of the most impressive in the entire Bible. One of the main lessons of seder is that we should all feel as if we have personally been saved from slavery. In order for these ideas to be available even to the youngest children, every taste, touch, smells, hears, and sees characters from history using a guidebook called Haggadah. We gathered eight different Haggadot families (multiple Haggada) recommended by early childhood educators of Reform Judaism (ECE-RJ) and families with young children by members of the Union for the Reform of Judaism (URJ). How are these Haggadots different from all the other Haggadot? While they are designed with young, wiggly, giggly children in mind, they provide enough substance to keep adults and older children challenged. They're for kids, but not childish. All are mostly in English, with Hebrew translated into English, and Hebrew is intended to read aloud transliterated (using English letters for Hebrew pronunciation). We couldn't come up with a favorite because there are so many ways to engage toddlers like there are families, but feel free to use your imagination, choose different parts of them (and other Haggadot), and improvise. Check these resources, too, if you plan to seder for 2 to 3 year olds or 4 to 5 years old. 1. Children's Haggad set in great type and beautifully illustrated by Davis Grebu, this Haggadah is widely used in community and school seders, but is equally well suited for family gatherings. It includes melodies for traditional seder songs, just a bit of Hebrew, and a folding section on how to set the table seder. 2. In every generation - PJ library of the Haggadah family This new, full color Haggada aims to make everything on the seder feel comfortable from newcomers, young, old, people who are not Jews, and others. The illustrations show a variety of Jewish peoplehood and it is organized so older children and adults can learn and follow the Passover story while younger children participate in the seder experience. 3. Haggad family: Seder for all generations Richly detailed illustrations make this Haggadah a holiday for the eyes. Each step of the seder is explained and illustrated to please your guests, whether it is their first seder or their 50th. Poems, stories and songs, including lyrics and musical scores, ensure that everyone can take part. 4. The Haggadah I family: For families with young children this new full-color edition of the classic includes characters on the sidelines to let the participants know when it's time for a song or when a section might interest a particularly curious little child. 5. Kveller Haggadah Colorful and clear, this Haggadah has special sections - Memory Lane and Top Secret - to enrich the basic rituals of the holiday. Another Night: Family Family Haggad Eta Haggad is useful for all types of seders, regardless of whether children are present or not. It is also useful as a spring board to introduce active elements into the seder each year as children grow up and learn. In addition to the published Haggadot, here are two downloads - kindly donated by preschool directors. Follow along with cover to cover or choose from a number of the many wonderful items they include in your home celebration. Both Haggadot contain references to melodies for modern and traditional Easter tunes. 7. Temple Emanu-El in Early Childhood Educational Program Pre-K Haggada Jill Cimafonte, Director of Preschool Education at the Emanu-El Temple in Westfield, New Jersey, uses this activity-filled Haggad for a congregation of 4- and 5-year-old students. It is easy to adapt for home use, and many adult parts can be combined if you have fewer people around your desk. 8. Temple israel ECLC Easter Haggad Lisa Samik, Director of Early Childhood and Family Engagement at the Temple of Israel of New York City in New York City, Ny, uses this delightful Haggadah coloring style to model a seder congregation for 2 to 5-year-olds as well as parents and grandparents. It includes singing, dancing and hunting for aficomene, all of which you can make at home! Still looking for the right Haggad for your seder? Everyone has Haggadah and follows with the leader, reading sympathetic and taking turns telling the story of the exodus of Jews from slavery in the land of Egypt. The Hebrew word Seder translates as order, and this refers to a ceremony that is held by every seder around the world year after year. Each time the same story is told, and traditions are passed down from generation to generation, as everyone, young and old, participates in its retelling. Everyone plays an important role in Seder, even the youngest children, so it is important to have strategies on hand throughout the evening to keep the kids engaged and excited to participate. After all, Seder needs children, but children don't always feel they need Seder. In the Jewish calendar, the days officially begin at sunset on the night before the holiday. Seder is always held after sunset on the first night of Passover, or Easter. Many families spend Seder on both the first and second nights, where the second night is a little more informal. Haggadah reads in order to get from start to finish as one of the 15 prescribed steps in Seder, including reading certain blessings, performing rituals like breaking matzo and washing your hands, and eating specific symbolic foods. Each of the rituals is performed during the evening, and its significance is explained as if it were being talked about for the first time. You can guess that after years of Seders, the story is becoming more familiar and children are beginning to anticipate and even look ahead their favorite parts of the evening! Since the celebration technically begins at sunset, and in the spring, which often happens around 7pm, toddlers can get hungry and sleepy. To ensure the success of the evening, families sometimes make accommodations for children under 13 members of the group, holding it early, feeding them dinner in front of Seder, and with special surprises planned throughout the evening. Baby Haggadahs Special Haggadahs for young children can make the evening extra fun and more inclusive, and they can be a break from more serious (and often quite long) traditional seders. You can make your own seder, starting with drawings such as those provided by Chabad.org, Global Justice Haggad (a socially conscious print book for families with older children), or one of several of JewishFreeware.org. Here are some of the best children's versions you can purchase in the book or electronic reader format as well. And finally, if your children are creative, and if you have time, read the story of the exodus from Egypt and share the order of Seder with them, then have the children draw photos and write a story to accompany it. Fun Seder activities and songs to keep everyone engaged Read four questions: This task always falls to the youngest member of the family, but take turns to recite it in English, Hebrew, and see who can translate it into the languages they learn at school. Try Dr. Seuss' version of the University of Calgary website! Let my people go : Download this read aloud, pass together a version of Ten Disasters. While you're at it, randomly assign each young guest one of the plague to scream when it's his turn. You can represent them in origami, on nametags, or with finger dolls. Chad Gadya: The story of a song about one goat Echod Mi Yodea. Do you think 12 days of Christmas is hard to remember? Try 13 principles of Jewish study. Learn the words and then prepare! Call the older children to go through the entire Hebrew version at the end of Seder. After several attempts, you can hold competitions on speed and accuracy. Hunting for Afikomen: Afikomen literally means what comes after, or dessert. In the beginning of Seder, the leader breaks the middle matzo on the plate Seder and hides it. The leader warns that Seder cannot be completed until Afikomen is found. In some families, the supervisor hides it, and the children have to find it at the end of the meal and return in exchange for a gift. In other families, children hide it and hold it for ransom - a small gift or gelt (coins) that must be paid to the children before they return it and Seder can be completed. The promise of hunting afikomen can often be enough to keep children engaged through all the haggad reading! Sometimes it takes more than just the promise of four cups of wine to keep adults at the table as well. Haggadah is a flexible document that can grow and year after year. This is a great opportunity to talk about issues, morality and religion on a personal and global level. You can change it by adding items to the Seder plate. In the past we've seen orange represent inclusivity, the Miriam Water Cup to represent the contribution of women, and the 2017 pineapple to call for the sight of refugees now fleeing danger. Watch the video below from the Jewish Community Reconstruction to see more of the characters and their meanings. Do you have a family Easter tradition that keeps kids engaged and excited for Seder?
